Now, remember that "early" is a relative term - for some parents, a 5:00 wake-up time is ideal, while for others, anything before 8:30 is considered "way too early!". That's why it's a good idea to establish an objective "waking too early" standard against which you can judge your situation. As a rule of thumb, if your child's wake-up time is after 6 a.m. and he or she is waking up fairly happy and refreshed, then you likely don't have an early waking problem on your hands.

Your baby can wake early in the morning before your desired wake time for a variety of reasons. It often happens when baby is extending night sleep and making it longer between feedings in the middle of the night. The baby who was waking at 3 AM to eat moves that feeding to 4 AM, then 5 AM, then 6 AM. These are considered night wakings.

~~Early Morning Wakings: What to do when baby wakes early~~

When a baby wakes up and you don't rush in to pick him up and start the day, it makes waking early seem less enticing. It offers him the opportunity to go back to sleep. Additionally, if he is content and you don't rush in to start the day and feed him, his body and metabolism will no longer be accustomed to eating at 5 am every morning.
